The reason was that she became a naval vessel when bought by the New Zealand Government, and no naval ships were listed in the register.

The Endeavour was surveyed by Lloyd's surveyors in September, 1955, in the early stages of negotiation for her purchase, said the Minister. She then went to the Antarctic and continued serving in the Falkland Islands Dependency.

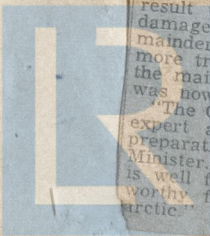

"On her return to Britain last June," said Mr. Eyre, "a further survey was carried out at the request of the New Zealand Government—only seven months after the original survey, so that there can be no doubt about her condition to continue her work in the Antarctic. All work recommended by Lloyd's as a result of this second survey has been carried out."

While coming to New Zealand, he said, a temporary and unpredictable fault occurred in the pumping system during heavy weather with the result that some of the cargo was damaged by water. For the remainder of the passage there was no more trouble, but an examination of the main suction system and pumps was now being made in Wellington.

"The Government has had the best expert advice in the selection and preparation of the ship," said the Minister. "We are satisfied that she is well found and will be fully seaworthy for her service in the Antarctic."

Japanese Boat Acts Strangely

SUVA, Nov. 23.—The crew of the ketch-rigged scow Scott, which returned to Suva yesterday, reported an encounter with a Japanese fishing boat which acted strangely off the island of Vatoa, in the southern Lau Group of Fiji.

The Scott was approached by a Japanese ship which came close along side. The Japanese began throwing fish on to the Scott's deck. The Scott's crew threw them back again. The Japanese craft then began edging the Scott dangerously close to a reef, so the Scott's Fijian skipper decided to try to get inside the reef.
