CEDRINGTON COURT
 The British steamer Cedrington Court, of 5160 tons gross, sank on Sunday, off the South-East Coast, after striking a mine. The vessel went down in ten minutes. Her crew of 34 have been landed at a British port, and one deck boy is in hospital with a broken leg. The crew, which got away in the ship's boats, were picked up by a drifter and afterwards transferred to a lifeboat which had put out from shore. When she struck the mine the Cedrington Court was completing a homeward voyage, having been at sea 17 days. Owned by Baldin & Philipps Ltd, London, the Cedrington Court was built in 1918 by Harland & Wolff Ltd, Belfast, as the War Eagle. After being renamed Cedrington she was chartered by the Court Line in 1929.

CREW OF 34

SHIP SUNK MINUTES AFTER COLLISION

The entire crew of 34 of the Cedrington Court (5,160 tons) were saved when the vessel sank 10 minutes after an explosion off the south-east coast on Sunday. Most of the crew had time to get away in the starboard lifeboat, but others, including Captain Bunge, the master, had to jump in the water. A deck boy, who was on look-out on the fore-castle head, was blown 20ft into the air by the explosion on the deck between the masts, and was killed with a broken leg. The crew were picked up by a drifter and afterwards transferred to a lifeboat from a south-east coast town, which brought them ashore. One of the crew owes his life to a man who jumped over the drifter and picked him up as he was going under for the last time.
